What am I?

I am a unique creature. One unique thing about me is that I have three hearts. Two of my hearts pump blood to my gills. My third heart pumps blood throughout my body. Not only do I have three hearts to pump my blood, but that blood is blue!

Let me tell you about one of my special abilities. If another creature tries to attack me, I can spray a cloud of an ink-like substance so that my attacker can't see me.

What am I?

Nearly 300 species of me exist. The smallest of my species is about the size of a quarter. The largest of my species would just fit into a two-car garage.

I have no bones so I can bend my body easily. I can squeeze myself through very small spaces.

If I lose one of my arms, a new one will grow back.

I have special skin cells that allow me to change my color to match my surroundings. This ability also helps me to escape from enemies.

What am I?

I am in a category of animals called the invertebrates.

Scientists say that I am the smartest of the invertebrates. I am able to recognize individual people. If I am put in a tank at an aquarium, I can sometimes figure out how to escape from it.

I am an octopus.

What am I?

I am unique in that I have so many arms – eight of them in fact. I use my arms to grab things and to crawl on the floor of my home, which is usually the ocean or sea.
